

Remember who you meet.

Without making them a contact.

Where you met, what they like and the detail that lets you reconnect, in a private notebook. Find them by what you remember, even when the name is gone.

The reality

What slips away, and why

The name goes first

You remember the café, the red helmet, the love of sea kayaking. Rarely the first name, which is all an address book can search.

A contact is too soon

Someone you met once clutters your contacts, shows up for the whole household and says nothing about how you met.

Notes don't add up

One note on your phone, another somewhere else: when you want to reconnect, nothing ties the person, the place and the conversation together.

The solution

A notebook built for memory

1

One clue is enough

A first name, even a doubtful one, a distinguishing detail or a photo gets you started.

2

The meeting, in context

The place, the occasion, the date, even a rough one, and who introduced you.

3

What helps you reconnect

What they like, what they know about you, the detail that restarts the conversation.

4

Your notes stay notes

A note taken on your phone becomes a card in one click, and stays linked to it.

5

One search box

A place, an interest or a phrase from a note is enough to find someone.

Grouped by occasion

Find someone by a single detail

With sample data

One word is enough

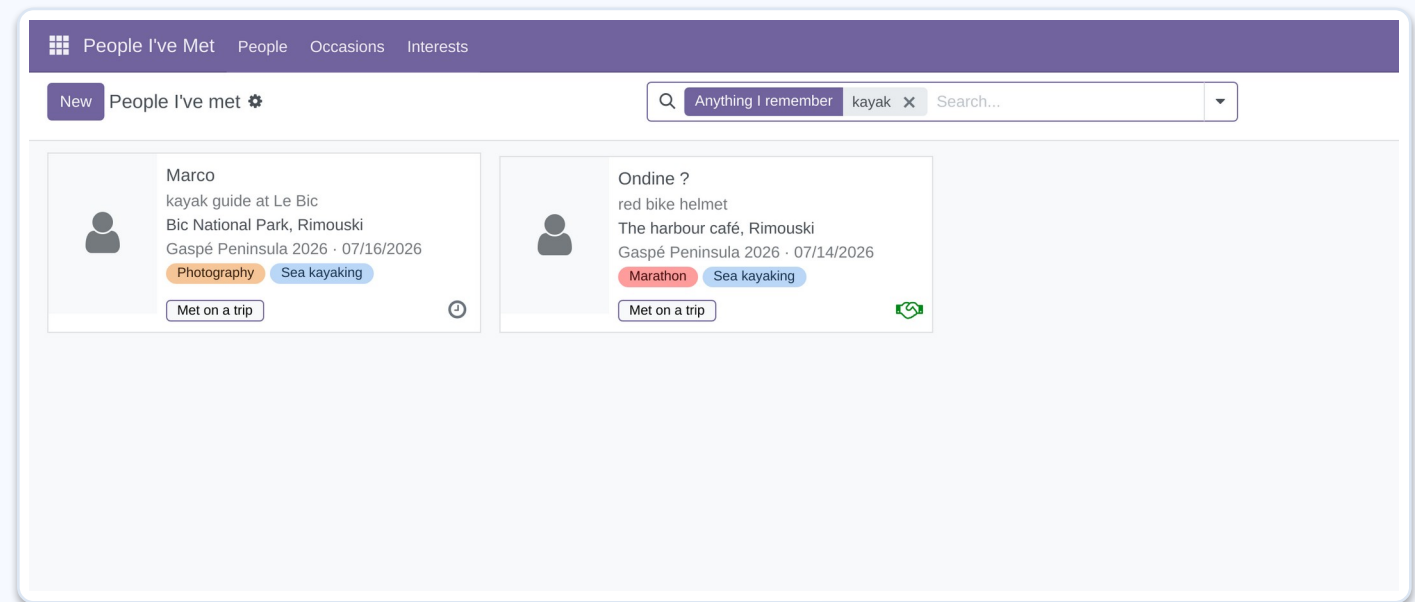

"kayak" finds Ondine and Marco through their interests, no name needed.

Grouped the way you think

By occasion, country, city, circle or year met.

Everyday filters

Not a contact yet, to reconnect, name not sure, shared with me.

A card made for reconnecting

With sample data

"Ondine ?"

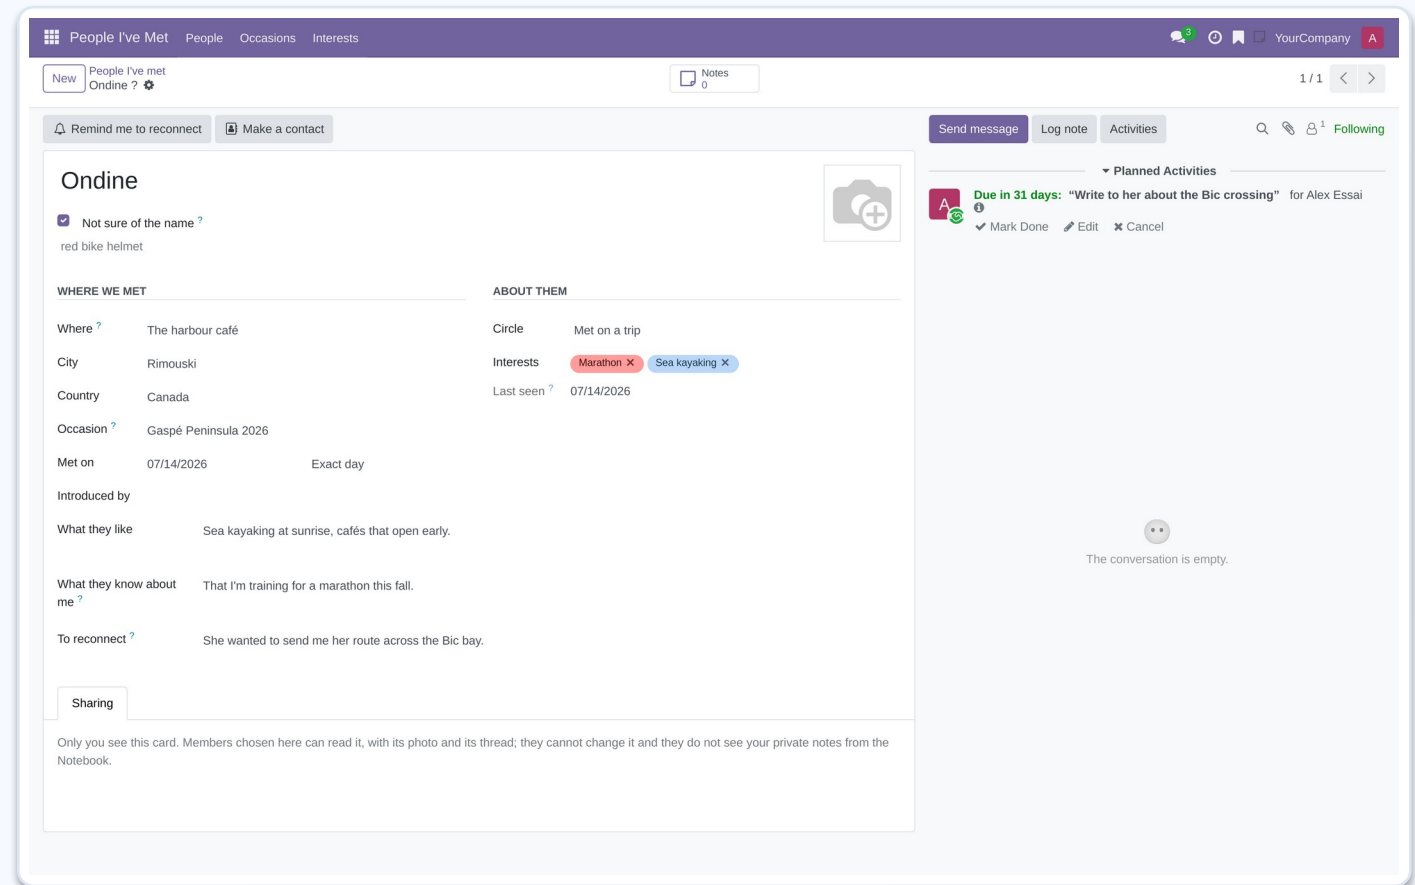

A name you're unsure of shows as such, and the search still finds it.

The detail to reconnect

What she meant to send you, what you told her about yourself.

A reminder, when you want one

A "Reconnect" activity on the date you pick. Nothing is scheduled unless you ask.

From a note to a card

With sample data

Write as you always do

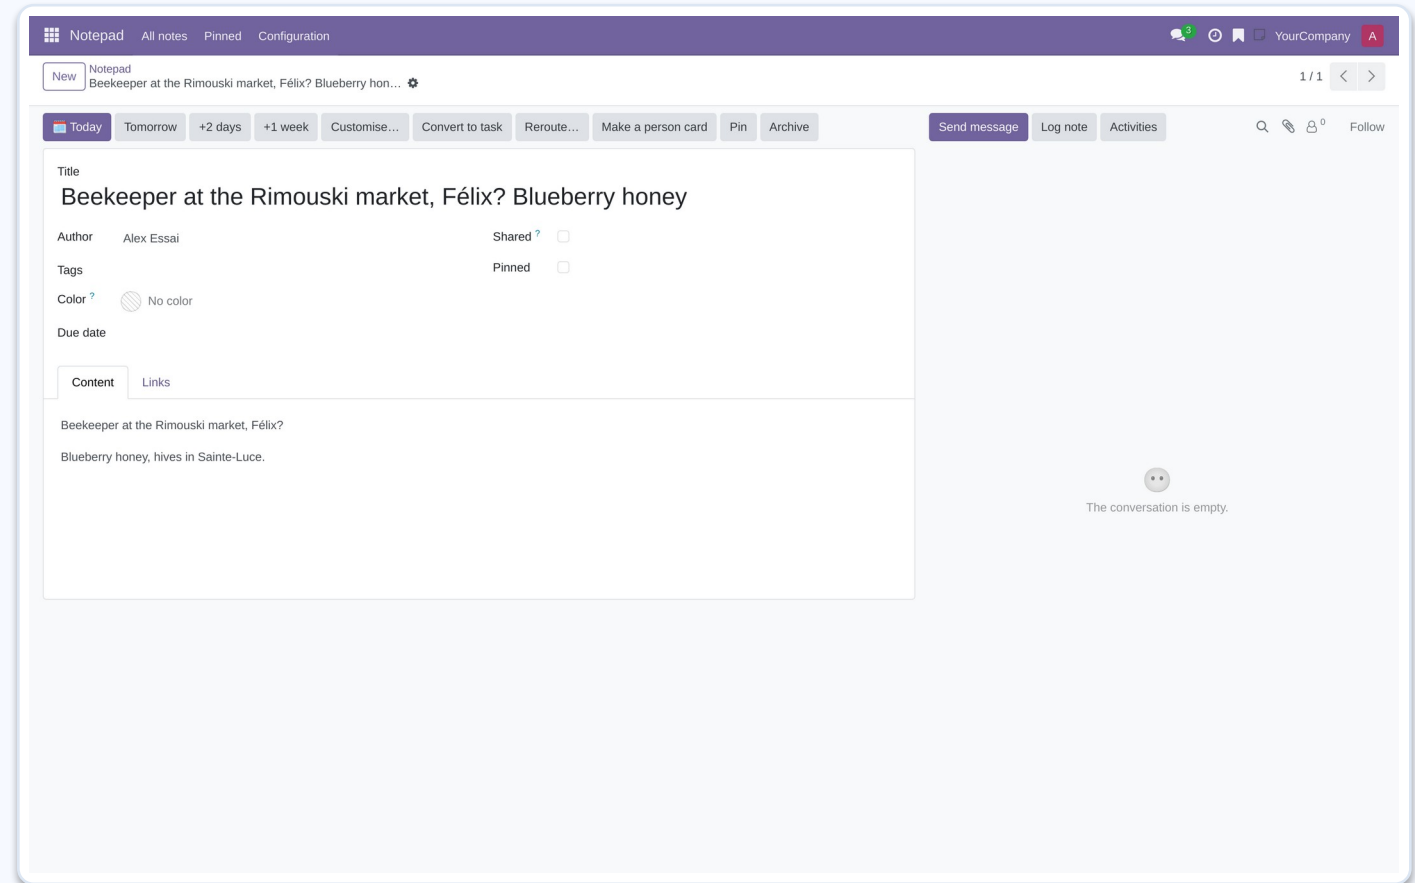

On your phone, offline or by voice, in the Notebook.

One button makes the card

"Make a person card" opens a new card that the note joins.

Last seen, with no typing

Your latest linked note tells you when you last met.

What's yours stays yours

A private notebook in a household instance

By role

You

Write, edit and share a card, or turn it into a contact.

A member

Reads a card you share with them, without changing it or seeing your private notes.

Household

Sees nothing, and cannot even tell a card exists.

Built-in protections

Private by default

Each card, its photo and its thread belong to the person who wrote it.

Sharing on purpose

Card by card, read-only, with the members you choose.

No one else notified

A card notifies you alone: no one else can be mentioned or alerted on it.

A contact, if you want one

Name, city, country and photo only. Your notes stay in the notebook.

In short

1

One clue to get started

A doubtful first name, a distinguishing detail or a photo

2

Find people by what you recall

A place, an interest or a phrase from a note

3

Your notes become cards

Taken on your phone, linked in one click

4

The notebook stays yours

Private by default, shared only when you choose

5

No contact before its time

Your address book changes only when you ask
